"They paved paradise and put up a parking lot..."

As part of the response to climate adaptation, we've been reading about communities in America and Canada who are ditching impervious surfacing in open spaces, such as school playgrounds, leisure facilities and church grounds, and replacing it with greenery and natural surfacing to assist with lowering temperatures and reducing flood risk.

A similar trend is now catching on in the UK. Postive.News recently shared Before and After photos of UK homes whose owners have re-wilded their front gardens. The Royal Horticultural Society reports that three times as many front gardens are paved over now compared to a decade ago, creating flood risk and a biodiversity disaster. RHS's campaign to get Greening Britain aims to transform unloved grey spaces into thriving planted places.

Nature recovery projects get a helping hand

We are thrilled to welcome John Della Pietra to our Natural Climate Solutions team. John will assist with nature restoration projects, including hedge planting at schools and ongoing activities with White Rose Forest. With a background in IT, John has worked on projects to calculate carbon emissions and more recently an automated tree planting birthday scheme. He enjoys walking and working on his Japanese-inspired garden.

Boost for ZCH Comms Team

We are delighted to welcome Georgina Cowley to the ZCH Comms team. Georgina brings with her over 14 years' experience in digital marketing, social media and events management which will help ZCH extend its reach and messaging to a wider audience. Georgina runs her own marketing consultancy based in Harrogate.
